Eeeeeekkk....So cute!! Loved this one, especially the ending!
This is an interesting volume, and the romance pace is interesting as well.

I mean it's not too fast, and it's not taking that much time (so far). Most of the crushes/love interests are already established when we get into the story, but we keep seeing how the "other side of the crush" is reacting and how it's taking them a long time to notice and the agony the person in love goes through. Also, besides the main relationship, the secondary relationships are taking the same approach.

Also besides the relationships drama, there is more family drama, so it's definitely interesting! This series is just the thing to read when you want a little drama mixed in with your romance. It's got a great mix of most everything I want in my shojo and it has yet to let me down whenever I come back to it.

Mao and Hiro keep orbiting one another in the strangest ways, though Hiro's denser than the petrified forest to not realize who the author of the online novel is (I HAVE to have mentioned that previously...). Still, they've got tons of affection (both overt and subtle) and cute moments together throughout.

We get lots of Hiro's brother Daiki in this instalment and he is far more nuanced than I was expecting from his introduction last volume. I did like how the part time job situation worked out especially, but his treatment of Mao is far different than I had figured on originally. It seems like this is going in a direction I think is a bit pointless, but that's a problem for next volume.

Mao is the secret sauce that makes this series really work. She and Hiro are a fine couple, as noted, but she really is not defined solely by her romance like so many other heroines. She's strong, independent (to a fault), and she might take time to come out with it, but she's honest with her friends.

Toss in some backstory for Mao's loser dad (no, seriously, he sucks no matter what his excuse is) and some great moments with Mao's friend Chi, who is believably teenagerbad at being forthright herself, and you have a solid cast of characters in a particularly good story. Great read. Cute, charming, and lively.

This is a solid volume with excellent storytelling. I'm very impressed with Taamo's ability to create an expressive story with a cast of diverse personalities with such minimal details. The overwrought, screentoned background art of larger mangaka studios would take away from the charm of this story. It's perfect the way it is.

Highlights for me this volume: The Hokkaido sunflower splash page was fun.

Taamo's comments are always a treat.

I love how Mao insists on doing chores even though she's terrible at it.

This was an important volume, storywise. First, there was the introduction to Daiki, Hiro's brother, a new roommate and personality to shake things up at the house. With his arrival, the part time work setting where the drama will happen was established.

The second chapter was about Radicals and Mao's relationship as Mao revealed their shared love interest was her roommate.

The third chapter gave us a peek inside both the heads of Hiro and Mao's dad. Now we know how Hiro feels towards Mao, and why he won't show it. As for the dad, although the mangaka wants the reader to sympathize with him, I find his behavior revolting. He's a terrible father. I find myself unwilling to forgive him.

The final chapter resolved the tension from the previous two chapters and gave the reader a romantic cliffhanger for the next volume.

Overall, a vital volume for the series. It was cute, charming, and lively.

Twisted plot yet simple. It's funny and cute how Daiki and Mao getting along with each other. But I'm having this feeling that Daiki is gonna fall for her. At first, I find the illustrations really weird and I thought I'm not going to like this story. But here I am, writing this review. So it must be really good ha.

Well, it is! I love that it wasn't just your cheesy romance story but it also has some depth into it. I love that it was also about family and you know me, I love family stories. So yep, I shed a tear or two while reading this whole series and laugh as well.

I'm not sure how to end this review with a bang you I can be able to convince you to try this out, but it was really good. Promise!
