Janet Caird didn't write many books that I'm aware of, although maybe were published in Britain than here in the U.S I liked them because they're all mysteries that take place in Scotland. This gothic suspense opens with a bizarre tidal wave hitting the town of Lochy. It sits on a great, deep, black loch somewhere in Scotland. A peaceful sleepy town. After they recover from the flood, people start noticing the loch seems to be losing its water. Getting lower and lower each day until it is empty. A strange eeriness descends on the town and no one wants to talk about the loch. Now an empty, dry sea bed, a cave has been revealed up on the cliffs. What mysteries does it hold? When Evan Ritchie, the town adventurer decides to climb the cliffs and investigate Janet stands at the edge of the loch bed and watches. Suddenly Evan is catapulted out of the mouth of the cave. Did he just lose his balance and fall or was he pushed? Janet is sure she saw movement at the cave before and that she saw a figure push Evan. But how could that be? Evan's body is battered and obviously tampered with. Someone or something is living in the cave. Alan, a local administrator in town and John the new minister are both sweet on Janet. The three of them decide they need to find out what is going on in the cave. What the men find there is mind blowing. This was a sweet read. Great suspense and unusual tale. I felt like I was on Loch Ness reading it. I enjoy Janet Caird's books. This is the third one I've read. Closer to 4.5 stars. Who knew an earthquake in Portugal could wreak such havoc in a loch up in Scotland. The book begins with a description of how the land and the lochs were formed ages ago. Then we meet the people in the town of Lochy Next, the earthquake causes a tidal wave tsunami that inundates Lochy The water recedes and everything gets back to normal, right No, something strange is going on with the Loch At this point I really don t want to say any about the plot Janet Caird sets up such a feeling of dread and fear as she writes about darkness, the senses and what is under the water in a deep loch Don t read this if you are afraid of the dark or what might be hiding in the dark Learned of this book and author from Hannah Started out good and unsettling Halfway thru it became stupidly weird.Big let down. Stephen King recommended book Noted as important to the genre we have been discussing from A great story about the sleepy little town of Lochy, near the water The quaint town is forced to come together when a tidal wide hits hard leaving death and destruction for the survivors However something is much worse than the powerful force of disaster Something is hiding in the caves Something primitive yet dangerous Will the townspeople figure it out in time An engaging read that actually causes you to feel claustrophobic when reading Caird is a master of building suspense as her characters wander the caves and someone or some creatures are silently waiting for the opportunity to strike Highly recommended. My son asked me to read this book which I was reading aloud to him when he was very, very young He has remembered it for over 30 years and has become very, very interested in books about alternate societies. A book of two sides An intriguing first half mysterious and captivating Flavoursome narrative and characters Once the tragedy strikes it all falls down to lower than avarage and tired suspense semi supernatural thriller A missed opportunity here. It all starts when an earthquake in Portugal shifts a fault line on a loch floor in Scotland This, in turn, triggers a tidal wave which reshapes the scenery and sets off a chain of events that bring horror to a small Scottish village where nothing ever happens.The loch starts recedingcaves appear where water once covered them Finally, the water completely drained, the inevitable happens People want to explore the caves But not all is as it appears..or as safe And then there s the caves inhabitants.who have lived there for hundreds of yearsAwesome book While I was reading this I thought of two books The Birds Other Stories by Daphne Du Maurier and The Time Machine by H.G Wells Both authors would have been
