The Dewdrops a Journey Begins is a collection of poetry by three poets Tripti Sharan, Neeti Banga and Abhijit Narayan I happened to meet Sharan and Banga at a book event, and they handed me a copy, which was how I ended up with a book of poetry, not something I am usually to be found reading I ll admit that I approached this with some trepidation I am not a fan of ellipses, and the fact that the very title of the book included ellipses put me off And yes, many of both Sharan s and Banga s poems are full of both ellipses as well as exclamation marks Not to mention a wince worthy proliferation of n instead of and in one poem and an occurrence of an even disastrous lols But, to the poems These are arranged poet wise, the first section being devoted to the poems of Tripti Sharan, followed by those of Banga, and ending with the poems of Narayan These are a very varied lot of poems, with themes ranging from love to betrayal, from social issues poverty, road rage, the discrimination against girl children and women to topics close to the hearts of individual poets Narayan, for instance, writes about why he loves to travel Sharan, a gynaecologist, has several poems that focus on experiences related to medicine, to human suffering and hospitals, to death.For me, the most accomplished of these poems are those of Narayan who breaks free of the impulse to write in rhyme, which allows his poetry to flow better His poems tend to be short, incisive, and generally modern Banga s poetry, while much of it conforms to a rhyme scheme, also appealed to me because she s adept at creating word pictures, and poems like Connecting the Dots and A Memory, I ll Be show a depth of emotion and an understanding of human nature that is endearing. Sharan's section of poetry was the one that didn't appeal to me. She labours too hard over it, forcing rhymes without thought to grammar or even the correct usage of words. My tongue that was always a nerd, is now thirsty for water and little words, as an example. Most of her poems tend to be wordy, and could have done with some very strict editing. My three star rating, therefore, is actually for Narayan's and Banga's poetry. Had this been only Sharan's poetry, 'The Dewdrops a Journey Begins' that title itself is an example of poor grammar. What does it mean would have got two stars from me.

I read the book every night just before going to sleep. Some beautiful flow of words and requisite themes. All three have done well but I personally feel Abhijit's poetry is a notch better just by an inch. It's a wonderful bed time read even to non-poetry lovers like me. A brilliant effort by the team.
