Beautiful, though riddled with animal cruelty Selected poems from the master Basho, a nobleman turned

Buddhist monk After his house burned down, he wandered Japan sharing and teaching his lovely haiku Also features poetry from his pupils.Favorites Nothing in a cicada s voice gives token of a speedy death In the bright moonlight what appeared as flowers is a cotton field A rainy day in June and yet the sunflower bends to the sun s course For all my contriving here I am again at the end of the year with nothing but my strip of matting Taking the cool at eve I do rejoice that I was born a man I, New Year s Day, with a clear sky and conversation among the sparrows Come, breeze Lightly blow upon the flowers, bubbles in the wine Behold the wild geese winding homeward, mingled with the pilgrim bands Begged by a sorry mate, the cat intently gazes at the sky Behold the leaf that sinks and clings below the water to a rock Plum blossoms Is it that the sap still courses through that single branch Weary perhaps of dolorous love, the cat has stolen a bit to eat The nightingale, and at the gate, the unexpected bean curd vendor.
