David Neilson is crossing a bridge He doesn't know where he is or how he got there, but along the way, he meets a guide who shows David where he needs to go to find out, by reliving portions of his life from childhood through marriage and parenthood. I think you can all see the metaphor here, right And to do Frankau justice, I don't think she's trying to disguise it However, it didn't work for me David is a man of intense religious faith, whereas his wife, Linda, is an atheist from the beginning but is eventually shown to be quite wrong in her beliefs, so that she turns to God in desperation because nothing else she tries helps her I disagree so deeply with this that only Frankau's gift for characters got me through it Also, Linda is bisexual, which I initially found an interesting choice, but her relationships with women are all shown as shallow and purely physical, wild aberration She concludes rather hypocritically that she doesn't condemn homosexuality in others, but that for her it was simply arrested development Again, sorry, but I deeply disagree with how this is handled too. All in all, I found the book worth reading for the characterization and because I love some of Frankau's other books, but the underlying viewpoints here left a bad taste in my mouth.

Some problems with this book the frame narrative is clunky and the Catholic mysticism stuff is pretty heavy handed But there was a spark of something there that made me care a lot about the characters and their relationships to each other And I cried and cried at the end.

There are bits of this book that I like but the whole framing narrative just does not do it for me I really do not care if the male protag is SAVED.
